

OBJECTIVES: -

Technical education is passing through a very critical stage in the country. With an increasing demand of technocrats, government and private institutions are coming up rapidly in India. The vast increase in technical institutions has developed a thought in proper management of technical institutes in terms of quality and quantity. The state governments have started their own technical universities with the aim to bring all technical institutes under a big umbrella to maintain the uniformity in terms of course curriculum, academic calendar and examination pattern to facilitate the students and institutes. These reforms need a complete support from the state governments to cater the demand of the engineers in the various industries in the present scenario.

If some improved and advance system can be developed, that will lead to a great help to the students and in turn to the society. The technical students can also be trained as per the demand of industries during the course of study so that he will get a job immediately and the industries can save their time and money in training them according to their requirements. This will certainly increase the productivity and improve the economy of the country. Autonomy of the technical institutions is one of the major issues connected to above aspects.
